

A week of mainsails and pinrails

Now that we have left Cuba and Jamaica behind us, it is time to prepare for the Atlantic ocean! This week the trainees will finish their sailtraining of the basic skills, as we will start with the internships next week. Since all 50 inhabitants of our tiny world got to know each other, we are learning to work together. Naturally, this goes hand in hand with a boatload of fun, irritation and, of course, romance.

If only we had a newspaper that would provide the masses with top-of-the-line journalism and gossip as juicy as a freshly cut pineapple. :)

This weeks editorial board consists of Feline, Floris A and Lobke, who will write our main article.

Smooth sailing, see you next week!

Ahoyy, Feline, Floris A and Lobke here. We are going to tell you something about our last week. This week was a pretty normal week, we just had normal days with no big adventures. Just self study and Happy Hour, a lot of sail trainings, and a sex carrousel that was really needed because people already slept in the same bunk ;). There were again this week 2 dinner dates, a date with someone you don't talk a lot with.

There was one special day, when a couple of trainees where just laying in the Jibnet, and suddenly they saw Bart swinging from the boat with a rope. A couple of seconds later all the trainees where laying in the sea. And we watched Friday a documentary about sailing and beauty and the beast on the main sail.

That was a lot of fun. This week we also started with morning watches, one of the groups then had no self study and had to help on deck. But we had to compensate that, so we had Friday 6 hours of self study, pure hell.

On lazy day (Sunday) the trainees must cook. At breakfast we made cinnamon bread, for lunch there was pizza bread with mustard soup, a verry good combo. For dinner we had Fries/ baked patato, with chicken and salad. The dinner looks a bit like last lazy day, because we had kapsalon. That were the same ingredients.
